Reynolds

Played one game for the St. Louis Whites in Des Moines, June 1, 1888

A SLUGGING EXHIBITION. Des Moines Trents St. Louis, to a Terrible Trouncing. Des Moines and St. Louis played another singular same of ball yesterday. The Missouri contingent of pitchers seems to be in a battered condition, and yesterday Manager Loftus handed the batting order to Manager Morton with Reynolds set down to do fite twirling. Morton then assigned Wells to the box and put in Schildknecht to do the back, stop work. The score cards were printed in that way. It seems that Reynolds is a local amateur who has distinguished himself recently by dropping a couple of games with the Stuart club. Just as play was about to be called Loftus attempted to run in Staley, the arack twirler of the St. Louis team, but to this Morton strenuously objected. A collogusy occurred, in which Loftus continued to Insist on Sta-

NO. 1 BASEBALL FAN.

GO WHERE you will, so long as there's a baseball game under way, and if you look carefully somewhere you'll find a whitemustached, white-haired fan, intently watching the players or those about him regarding the play, or perhaps demonstrating the swing of a bat or a move to firstbase to some aspiring young-ster.

It doesn't matter whether on Stanbery,

For years Stanbery was a regular attendant at League park for the Western league games and when the Demons were on the road he was equally attentive to the sandlotters. For he was once a Des Moines sandlotter himself.

He started playing with the Des Moines Grays as a pitcher, being graduated from that club to the 12-team National league in which he played with Louisville from 1895 to 1898, inclusive, as pitcher and secondbaseman.

"THAT WAS when most every splayer wore a mustache and a kid didn't have much chance to make good with all the oldtimers making it tough for him and trying to run him out of the ball park," Stanbery commented the other day.

"Eventually I injured my arm and that ended my professional career, but not my interest in baseball. I returned to Des Moines and played with local clubs for several years and have been following them ever since."

Stanbery watches the young prospects carefully, gives them advice if they ask for it, and sometimes makes recommendations to major league scouts.
